2013 Projects

"IOM Migration Research and Training Centre (MRTC) conducts a wide range of projects, including research projects for the development of migration policy, and education and cooperation projects to enhance policy practice by utilizing domestic and international networks."
2013 Research Projects

The MRTC performs a wide range of research works, which include 1) analyzing in detail about immigration policies implemented at the central government and local government levels, thereby providing suggestions for the improvement of policy efficiency; 2) identifying migration trends of the Republic of Korea by using migration-related administrative statistics and survey data; and 3) providing preliminary materials for policy development and scholarly research. The MRTC’s research part also delivers latest information about changes in the international migration policy landscape and about newly-introduced immigration law system or policies of major migration countries with an aim to contribute to on-going efforts to further improve immigration policy of the Republic of Korea.

In 2013, the MRTC’s research projects looked closely into policies related to foreign students, immigrant children and agricultural foreign workers, and introduced issues ranging from migration and environment, migration and security, migration and development, foreign workers policy in farming and domestic service areas, anti-racial discrimination policies and to legal systems for international marriages in Asia.

The MRTC’s 2013 publications include 7 research reports, 14 working papers, 2 statistical briefs, and 2 books.
Long- and Short-term Strategies for Effective Utilization of Excellent Foreign Students

Background and purpose
- To find ways to utilize foreign students who earned degrees in Korea as highly skilled workforce as a response to fierce global competition for talented workers
- To develop policies targeting competent foreign students who have become accustomed to Korean language and culture while they are studying in Korea so that they may function as a bridge between their home country and Korea
- To make recommendations about how to expand the scope of Korea’s current foreign student policies from attraction to retaining them as quality workforce after graduation

Key point
- The number of foreign students has skyrocketed since the mid-2000 and among them, those who are on scholarships or those in masters or doctoral programs have been categorized as excellent foreign students since they have a good chance of taking up high-value added jobs after graduation and show great zeal for learning.
- Among the foreign student graduates who are currently employed, about 46.1% has taken up jobs that have some relevance to Korea; and the percentage is lowest in the case of graduates of engineering programs with mere 25.9%
- Unlike policies of other countries, Korea’s foreign student policy mainly focuses on the early stage of attracting foreign students, thus, more attention should be given to the next step and formulate short- and long-term strategies and policies to utilize excellent foreign students as highly skilled workforce
- Recommendation for short-term strategies: 1) Job fair for excellent foreign students; 2) Development of post-graduation regulations for Korean government scholarship foreign students; and 3) Expansion of internship for excellent foreign students through educational-industrial consortium, and recommendations for long-term strategies: 1) Establishment of differentiated foreign student policy for excellent foreign students; 2) Development of Asian-talents utilization programs; and 3) Activation of Human Resource Management System (HURIK)

Publication

Employment Situation of Foreign Agricultural Workers and Policy Recommendations

Background and purpose
- Due to seasonal factors, some crop-growing sectors have been experiencing difficulties in hiring workers for a year-long period, and as a result, it led to serious employer-worker disputes. This study aims to lay ground for policy development to address these issues.
- With the media relentlessly reporting about the poor human rights situation of foreign agricultural workers, this study attempts to suggest improvements for current policies.
- Over 30 surveys have been conducted to examine the operation of the Employment Permit System since 2000, but few focused on the agricultural sector except for manufacturing and construction sectors. This study is conducted to provide a preliminary data on the current foreign agricultural workers to help the formulation of foreign agricultural workers policy

- Analyzed 1) Background of introducing foreign workers to the Korean farming sector; 2) Development of foreign agricultural workers policy; 3) Operation of EPS in the farming sector; and 4) Employment situation of local and foreign workers, and also closely examined 1) Current numbers and working conditions of foreign agricultural workers; 2) How farm employers are utilizing foreign workers in their farm businesses; and 3) Difficulties experienced by farm employers in hiring foreign workers
- Conducted an in-depth interview with farm employers, relevant government officials and foreign workers in four areas of Gyeonggi province (Goyang, Anseong, Icheon, and Pocheon) and surveyed 257 farm businesses within Gyeonggi province to find about overall supply and demand of workers and utilization of foreign workers
- Suggested adopting off-season options for foreign workers (Korean language class/skills improvement classes, non-paid leaves, transferring to other farms, etc.) or introducing “Adjusted Working Hour System,” and highlighted a need for encouraging farm employers to participate in labour management training programs to help them better tackle problems and issues arising from hiring foreign workers
- Recommended that a foreign worker’s skills competency be evaluated at the screening stage since there is a high demand for skilled manual workers but it is difficult to offer them skills training sessions after their arrival in Korea

Research Projects

Legal Systems for International Marriages in Asia

Background and purpose
- With a growing number of international marriages since the latter part of 1990s, both receiving and sending countries have been experiencing numerous social issues, yet substantive discussions on legal systems related to international marriages have not much taken place. This study is designed to lay a foundation for future research on these topics.
- To identify issues that could arise from the discrepancies of the laws of different countries regarding international marriages and to find ways to resolve such issues.
- To present country-specific cases of the six countries selected both in Korean and English to inform larger audience in and outside Korea.

Key point
- International marriages in Asia spread to other Asian countries, such as Taiwan and South Korea, starting from Japan in 1980s, and with the development of commercial brokerage mechanism, it raised sensitive social issues in both sending and receiving countries.
- The fundamental legal issue regarding international marriages arises from the fact sending and receiving countries have differing laws; for example, commercially brokered marriages are considered legal in receiving countries while they are regarded illegal in sending countries.
- This study examines the current developments of laws and legal systems in both receiving (Korea, Taiwan, Japan) and sending countries (the Philippines, Vietnam, Cambodia) of marriage migrants in Asia and explores on social issues raised in each individual country, and they are studied by local academics and legal experts.
- This study helps better understand the significance of international marriages in Asia in the context of international migration, and suggests legal partnership mechanisms at the regional level.

Publication
- Research Collection: Legal Systems related to International Marriage in Asia: South Korea, Taiwan, Japan, Philippines, Vietnam, and Cambodia

Analysis on International Trend of Migration and Crosscutting Issues

Background and purpose
- To highlight migration-driven changes seen in the international community; identify crosscutting issues; and draw policy implications.
- To find and analyze crosscutting issues on the idea of “how the complexities of international migration mutually affect individual migration patterns,” which is an issue of importance to overseas policy discussions, but often neglected by Korean policy research circles.
- To publish a series of working papers to give a thorough analysis of migration complexities, and thereby contributing to the efforts of building a micro-level research foundation for the making of migration policy.

Key point
- A Brief Review of the Role of Diasporas in the Migration-Development Nexus
- Examines the concept of diaspora and how they build and use social networks and analyzes how cross-national diaspora networks are affecting development and the role of diaspora.
- International Refugee Migration and Security
- Examines a research trend of security issues surrounding massive movement of refugees, which is part of forced migration occurring as a result of conflicts between countries, and studies related issues.
- Environment and Migration in Asia
- Recognizing that environmentally-induced migration in Asia requires urgent policy attention, it aims to provide an overview of the key migration flows that are and could be induced by environmental changes across Asia and highlights some policy directions.
- Trends Analysis to Promote Regional Cooperation on International Migration in East Asia
- Examines recent trends of regional cooperation on labour migration that are taking place in Southeast Asia and provides a platform for discussions on the building of international migration cooperation mechanism in the Southeast Asian region.
- Diaspora and Development in Nepal: A Sluggish State and Heterogeneous Diaspora
- Examines diaspora policy of the Nepal government and analyses political and socio-cultural factors that shape dialogues on diaspora and diaspora heterogeneity.

- Working Paper: International Refugee Migration and Security
- Working Paper: Environment and Migration in Asia
- Working Paper: Trends Analysis on International Cooperation on Migration in East Asia

Research Projects

Analysis of OECD Report on Migration Trends

- Some discrepancies have been found among OECD publications of Korea-related statistics and domestically-produced Korean statistics in terms of technical terms and focus areas. This comparative study will help improve the accuracy of statistical data in the future.
- This study attempts to give an empirical analysis of a cause-effect relationship among factors that affect migration policy with a focus on OECD countries.

Global Policy Trends of Issues that Concern Korea

- To find new research areas on emerging issues that are of great concern to Korea but that have not gained much attention so far, for example, how such issues influence Korean economy and society, and to understand global policy trends and draw implications on Korea.
- To look at two contentious policy issues concerning Korea: 1) Foreign agricultural workers policy, and 2) Foreign domestic workers policy, for whom the demand is likely to grow fast with a rapid aging of Korean population.
- To explore overseas policy trends that are also of concern to Korea so that the study may serve as a trusted resource for the legislation of migration policies.

Background and purpose

Key point

• Critical Review of the OECD International Migration Outlook
  Examine the definitions and computations of the Korean immigration statistics presented in OECD’s International Migration Outlook and compares them with immigration statistics produced locally in Korea.
• Determinants of International Migration in the Highly Skilled Migrants
  Analyze how factors such as economic (GDP per capita), human resource, environment, institution support and country specificity affect the international movement (brain drain) of highly skilled workers.
• An Exploratory Study on the Relationship between Brain Drain and National Competitiveness
  Examines the current state of brain drain and national competitiveness using the OECD’s cross-country data (2000 & 2006/06) and analyzes the relationship between the two variables.

Publication

- Statistical Brief: Critical Review of the OECD International Migration Outlook
- Working Paper: Determinants of International Migration in the Highly Skilled Migrant
- Working Paper: An Exploratory Study on the Relationship between Brain Drain and National Competitiveness

Background and purpose

Key point

• Looked at countries that have in place the Seasonal Worker Program, including the U.K., Australia, and Canada and also Japan, which introduced a foreigners functional training system.
• Studied countries that have already adopted foreign domestic workers program - Hong Kong, Singapore, Taiwan, Germany and Italia - in order to understand characteristics inherent in the space and service of domestic labour, and examined the issues concerning workers’ human rights and emotional attachment.

Publication

- Research Report: Employing Foreign Domestic Workers: Issues and Debates in Host Societies
- Working Paper: Employing Foreign Agricultural Workers: Case Studies of Australia and Canada

A Study of Anti-Racial Discrimination Policy

Background and purpose
- With a series of media reports on verbal and behavioral discrimination against foreigners, the issue of the Korean government’s failure to set up anti-racial discrimination has gained keen attention.
- Korea does not have an established law and system to prevent racial discrimination and to punish those who discriminate others on the basis of race. Thus, this study attempts to lay a foundation for the making of national-level anti-racial discrimination policy.
- This study looks at traditional immigration countries that have in place anti-racial discrimination laws and systems and are well into implementing them, and analyzes the development of their laws, systems and policies and draws policy implications for Korea.
- Migration of foreign nationals is one of the critical social phenomena seen in Korea and is affecting the society at all levels - politics, economy and culture. Against this backdrop, this study aims to conduct an in-depth analysis of key migration issues and trends of Korea based on available immigration indices and statistics.
- To inform scholars, activists and policy practitioners as well as the public in and outside Korea of the current address of Korea’s migration, to suggest policy objectives, and to provide preliminary materials for the development of policy agenda.

Key point
- The US Civil Rights Act prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin in all social areas. While affirmative action is praised for being one of the most successful anti-racism policies, it is not free from criticism in terms of the tone of argument and supporting grounds.
- The Canadian Human Rights Act and Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms prohibit discrimination based on race, and in 2005, Canada’s Action Plan Against Racism was established.
- Australia has in place the Racial Discrimination Act and the Racial Hatred Act, and the National Anti-Racism Strategy was adopted in 2012.
- This study looks at policy definitions, history of policy development, related policies and grounding laws and execution structures of policies and laws, including overseeing agencies, etc. of the countries selected.

Publication
- Research Report: A Study of Anti-Racial Discrimination Policy: A Case Study of USA, Canada and Australia

Migration Trend of Korea 2013

Background and purpose
- Migration of foreign nationals is one of the critical social phenomena seen in Korea and is affecting the society at all levels - politics, economy and culture. Against this backdrop, this study aims to conduct an in-depth analysis of key migration issues and trends of Korea based on available immigration indices and statistics.
- To inform scholars, activists and policy practitioners as well as the public in and outside Korea of the current address of Korea’s migration, to suggest policy objectives, and to provide preliminary materials for the development of policy agenda.

Key point
- This study selected eight topics from the Second Basic Plan for Immigration Policy and conducted a linear comparison using migration-related indices and statistical data and provided a comprehensive and objective analysis of migration trends (both stocks and flows).
- The topics include familiar ones such as foreign students, international marriage migrants, overseas Koreans and the attitudes of Korean nationals towards migrants, and unusual ones such as internal migration of foreign workers, crimes by foreigners, remittance service and foreign tourists.

Publication
- Research Collection: Migration Trend of Korea 2013
Education & Cooperation Projects

As part of education & cooperation projects, the MRTC, in partnership with scholars and experts as well as relevant organizations in and outside Korea, hosts a wide range of seminars, training programs, workshops and forums to help facilitate policy development and practices. Such educational or training programs are carried out at both regional and international levels with a purpose to substantively contribute to the upgrading of expertise on immigration policies and to create an effective channel for information sharing and dialogues.

In 2013, the MRTC undertook joint projects with relevant organizations, academic societies and local NGOs to address issues of common interests in a more concrete and topic-focused manner. This led to more fruitful outcomes and more efficient management of projects and to building stronger ties with partnering organizations.

The MRTC hosted over 10 events in the form of seminars, discussions, forums and workshops, and about 370 persons, including globally recognized scholars and experts, and policy legislators and government officials from home and abroad, were invited to these events.

Research Report

Study on Policies and Laws for Minors with Immigrant-background
IOM MRTC Research Report Series No. 2013-01

Jung-Eun Oh, Chi-Young Koh, Kyung-Mi Kim, Anna Kim, Sang-Wuk Ahn, Ji-eun Jang, You, Kyung Han

This research aims to propose improvement plans for current policies and laws applied to immigrant minors residing in Korea so that they can grow into sound members of society, through analyzing the current policies and laws and grasping their problems. For this, the research first examines the policies and laws of Korea for minors with immigrant-background and the policies and laws of Germany, Japan, France, and Australia which have developed the related policies and laws prior to Korea or whose circumstances are similar to Korea. Then, the research analyzes problems of current policies and laws as well as foreign cases corresponding to those problems and proposes enactment of the special law for minors with immigrant-background in respect for distinct characteristics of minors. Finally, it suggests improvement plans for the current policies and laws related to immigrant minors in various fields such as residence, education, welfare, medical care, and career so that the proposed special law for minors with immigrant-background can supplement the current policies and laws for immigrant minors.

Long-and Short-term Strategies for Effective Utilization of Excellent Foreign Students
IOM MRTC Research Report Series No. 2013-03

Jung-Eun Oh, Chi-Young Koh, Kyung-Mi Kim, Anna Kim, Sang-Wuk Ahn, Ji-eun Jang, You, Kyung Han

This research aims to find how the Republic of Korea (hereafter, Korea) can strategically utilize excellent foreign students who received their degrees in Korea and whose potential could contribute to the Korean national development as competition to attain highly qualified human resources among states intensifies. To meet the research purpose, this research report defines who the excellent foreign students are and analyzes the influx dynamics as well as the current status of excellent foreign students residing in Korea. Then, through a survey, it grasps the reality that excellent foreign students face in Korea. It also looks up to the countries including Germany, USA, Japan, Canada and France that pro-actively formulate policies to attract and utilize excellent foreign students. In conclusion, this research report sums up the problems occurring under the current foreign students policies which having been implemented in Korea and suggests effective strategies for utilizing excellent foreign students in the long-term and short-term.

Employing Foreign Domestic Workers: Issues and Debates in Host Societies
IOM MRTC Research Report Series No. 2013-04
Seei Choi, Minjae M. B. Asis, Kyung Mi Kim
In the Republic of Korea, women’s participation in the labor market is expected to increase as the country experiences severe challenges arising from a prolonged period of low fertility and an aging population. Women’s participation in the labor market leads to outsourcing of domestic work, childcare and eldercare tasks that had long been undertaken by women in the family. Recently, suggestions have been made in Korea to open up the domestic labor market because of the limitations in the Korean government’s childcare policy as well as the high cost of hiring domestic workers. The aim of this study is to review the cases of Hong Kong, Singapore, Taiwan, Italy and Germany, and provide insights for the Korean government to consider in contemplating the idea of opening up the labor market to foreign domestic workers. Each case looks at the history and current state of employing foreign domestic workers, relevant legislation, issues and debates arising from employing them.

Analysis on Migration Trend of Immigrant Children in South Korea
IOM MRTC Research Report Series No. 2013-06
Kiseon Chung, Chang Won Lee, Chi-Young Koh, Yun-Suk Lee, Meesook Kim
This research is a comprehensive report on migration trend of registered immigrant children under 18 years old, who were born in or came to South Korea during the last decade (2003-2012) with the purpose of staying in the country longer than 10 days. Using the database of Korean Immigration Service statistics, this study examines the basic demographic/nationality characteristics of these children including their sex, age, home country, current visa status, residence period and residence areas. It also analyses the inflow and outflow of migrant children for the last 10 years, as well as specific groups of immigrant children, such as naturalized citizens, Korean-born, and those who are staying in South Korea after they became over 19 years old.

A Study of Anti-Racial Discrimination Policy: A Case Study of USA, Canada and Australia
IOM MRTC Research Report Series No. 2013-05
Julia Joon Shih, Seei Choi, Romee Lee, Chang Won Lee, Sojin Yu
In Korea there is no established law and system to prevent racial discrimination and the practice of racial discrimination is not yet regarded as a criminal offense. Accordingly, there is no anti-racial discrimination policy properly taken in place. This study aims to look at these traditional immigration countries (USA, Canada and Australia) that have established anti-racism discrimination laws and systems and are well into implementing them. Each case study looks at the background, legislation and implementation of anti-racism policy and draws policy implications for Korea.

Migration Trend of Korea, 2013
IOM MRTC Collection of Migration Policy Research No. 03
Dong Kwan Kang, Anna Kim, Chaekyu Park, Jungwon Lee, Chang Won Lee, Hyun A Lee
The number of foreign residents has grown up by 2.3 times from 880,000 in 2003 to 1.59 million as of September 2013, which takes up approximately 3 percent of Korea’s total population. With an increase of foreigners the migration trends of foreigners have become one of the key social phenomena in Korea affecting every dimension of the society, including politics, economy, and culture, in a way that is not experienced before and thus, efforts have been made to look at this migration trends from a different angle and to develop policy measures to effectively respond to such phenomena. Migration Trends in Korea 2013 is designed to provide a concise report on a number of migration-related topics with an in-depth analysis of the status and trends of the topics selected, and thereby providing researchers, policy makers and practitioners as well as the general public with preliminary materials to understand the current picture of Korea’s migration status. It aims to help set up directions and agenda for future migration policy. The topics include familiar topics such as foreign students, marriage migrants, overseas Koreans, the attitudes of Korean nationals towards migrants and unusual topics such as internal migration of foreign workers in different local areas in Korea, crimes by foreigners, remarriage of service providers, and tourists from overseas.

Legal Systems related to International Marriage in Asia: South Korea, Taiwan, Japan, Philippines, Vietnam, and Cambodia
IOM MRTC Collection of Migration Policy Research No. 04
Younghee Cho, Dong Han Im, Yoko Yoshida, Oo Chhan Gwee Sue, Do Tha Hwa Huy, Gedda Myra Repato Roma, TIEP Pratulanee
International marriages by commercial marriage brokers, starting from Japan in the 1980s, have spread to other Asian countries, such as Taiwan and South Korea, and related social issues in both origin and receiving countries of marriage migrants in Asia. Although this type of international marriage has continued to take place in Asia, legal status of marriage brokerage differs between sending and receiving countries in the region. Therefore, it requires mutual effort from both sides to resolve relevant legal problems and policies in order to improve human rights for marriage migrants by understanding each other. In this context, this research explores current legal systems and legal issues of international marriages in Asian countries, in terms of making improvements to them. South Korea, Taiwan, Japan, and Philippines are discussed in this research as receiving countries while the Philippines, Vietnam, and Cambodia are considered as sending countries. Each case of countries are studied by local academics and legal experts who are familiar with recent legal systems related to international marriage in their countries.
A Brief Review of the Role of Diasporas in the Migration-Development Nexus

Julia Juwon Shin

This study examines the policies of Australia and Canada on the employment of foreign workers in the agricultural sector and outlines the debates surrounding it. In Australia, the Working Holiday Maker Program has been a primary means to fill labor shortages in the agricultural sector, and recently citizens from the Pacific Islands and Timor-Leste have been employed in this sector through the Seasonal Worker Program. In Canada, the government has implemented the Seasonal Agricultural Workers Program to satisfy labor needs arising from the sector for almost a half century, and new programs have been recently introduced to offer more options for Canadian employers.

Employing Foreign Agricultural Workers: Case Studies of the United Kingdom and Japan

Seon Choi, Yejin Shin

This study examines the policies of the United Kingdom (UK) and Japan on the employment of foreign workers in the agricultural sector and outlines the debates surrounding it. In the UK, the expansion of the European Union ignited the debate in the UK as to whether to invoke the Seasonal Agricultural Worker Scheme which has been operated since the Second World War. In Japan, the government officially refuses the admission of unskilled foreign workers, but the agricultural sector has relied on migrant workers labelled as the ‘technical intern trainees’.

Determinants of International Migration in the Highly Skilled Migrants

Dong Kwan Kang, Sunho Lee, Jeongyoung Hwang

The international migration of highly skilled migrants has become a common phenomenon across the world with the globalization. In the context, this study analyses how the determinants such as economic determinants (GDP per capita), human capital determinants (tertiary education entry ratio), environmental and institutional determinants (R&D investment, urbanization rate, unemployment rate), and country-specific characteristics determine international migration of highly skilled migrants. To test the robustness of estimated results, four group samples were constructed: 1) nine OECD countries, 2) OECD countries excluding the Central America, 3) 11 non-OECD countries, and 4) non-OECD countries (excluding the Central America). The results show that GDP per capita, unemployment, trade volume (openness), and global index have a statistically significant and positive impact on the international migration of highly skilled migrants, whereas R&D investment and urbanization rate have a statistically significant and negative impact in most countries. In the other hand, GDP per capita, R&D investment, and unemployment rate are positively and significantly related to international migration of the highly skilled migrants in the OECD area.

An Exploratory Study on the Relationship between Brain Drain and National Competitiveness

Dong Kwan Kang, Sunho Lee, Jeongyoung Hwang

Globalization has led many countries around the world to compete for highly skilled migrants as a strategy to enhance national competitiveness and the international migration of highly skilled migrants (so-called brain drain) has now become a commonplace. Against this background, we conducted an empirically analysis the relationship between brain drain and national competitiveness using the OECD’s cross-country data. We used the migration ratio of highly skilled migrants from the Database on Immigrants in OECD Countries (DIOC 2000 & 2005/06) to compute brain drain among OECD countries and also used Global Competitiveness Index 2001 & 2006 (including subindices) of World Economic Forum to measure national competitiveness. The results show that brain drain is positively but not significantly related with national competitiveness regardless of selected models or estimated methods. However, the results imply that brain drain, through R&D investment and accumulated human capital, might indirectly influence national competitiveness.

Internet Usage and Social Adaptation among Permanent Residents and Naturalized Citizens in South Korea: Focusing on Marriage Migrants

Chang Won Lee

This paper studies the impact of Internet usage on social adaptation among marriage migrants residing in South Korea. Considering the environment in which the Internet enables migrants maintain daily connections to their home countries, the paper examines how Internet usage affects the sense of belonging and psychological health of the marriage migrants. The study uses a survey on the living condition of permanent residents and naturalized citizens in South Korea, conducted by the IOM Migration Research Training Centre in 2013. The results present that the majority (64.5%) of the marriage migrants have a dual sense of belonging, which serves to reduce their psychological distress. The study also finds that the odds of having a dual sense of belonging is increased by Internet usage for relationship purposes such as e-mail, online-chat, or Internet phone, while no significant effect is found from time spent on the Internet. The positive effect of a dual sense of belonging for the psychological health of the marriage migrants suggests a shift from a national to a transnational perspective in understanding the social adaptation of migrants.
The empirical studies on determinants of foreign worker's wage in Korea lagged behind the other countries. Thus, we set up five hypotheses in order to explain the determinants based on various theories of wage determination and tested them with 'earnings function' using the raw data from a Survey on Foreigners Residing in Korea 2010 conducted by the Ministry of Justice. The empirical results show that weekly working hours, possession of relevant certificates, necessary time period to become skilled, those who are in technical post, and the firm size have positive effects on wages, which are statistically significant at least at 10%. In conclusion, if other things remain equal, the payment of foreign worker is comparatively high when the worker works at a relatively large company or a job that demands longer period of time to be skilled, or the worker who has high level of Korean language skills, certificates related to this job, and who has been continuously employed for a longer period.

The Effects of National Identity on Acceptance of Foreign Immigrants as Korean Citizens

Sekho Kim, Eunsun Park

Analyzing the 2010 Korean General Social Survey, this study examines the effect of national identity on the acceptance of different ethnic groups as Korean citizens. We hypothesized that Koreans would gradually develop a more open attitude toward foreigners as daily interaction with them became more frequent. However, the impact of ethnic identity remained strong. Strong ethnic identity seems to function as an obstacle to accepting immigrants as "our people." This is the result of the distinctive meaning that Koreans attach to the title "citizen" or "Kukmin." On the other hand, respondents holding a strong civic identity are more likely to accept North Korean defectors and Korean Chinese as Korean citizens. This result seems to reflect the fact that Koreans tend to be ambivalent about these newly coming Koreans lack civilian properties necessary for the Korean citizenship. Lastly, national pride has no influence on the acceptance of foreign immigrants as citizens. This result indicates that Koreans are reluctant to accept other ethnic groups as citizens due to their strong national and ethnic identity, but more so ethnic identity.
Based on existing literature, this study examines why Nepal is unable to see any tangible benefit from its people abroad. In particular, this scholarship overviews Nepali state’s diaspora incorporation strategy and observes factors such as political, socio-cultural and diaspora heterogeneity, which might have an impact on the nexus between diaspora and development in Nepal. Upon analysis, it was learnt that the state policy responses to incorporate its people abroad in Nepal are very weak and sluggish. Due to perpetual political instability, the state is unable to exploit its vast diaspora resources. Moreover, heterogeneity based on caste and ethnicity in the diaspora has not only limited the prospect of diaspora-led development practices in Nepal but also has shaped conflicts of interests among the Nepalese communities abroad.

Thakur Prasad Subedi

The purposes of this study are to examine the trend of international marriage and its current conditions and to analyse the social mobility of international marriage migrants by measuring their subjective assessment in Korea and their motherlands, respectively. In specific, because many of women marriage migrants intended to improve their economic condition by marrying Korean men, it is very important to understand the conditions of their social mobility and suggest some polices to improve their economic situation.

A Study on the Social Mobility of International Marriage Migrants in Korea: Focusing on the Migrants of Gyeonggi Province

Chaekyu Park

The OECD’s International Migration Outlook (IMO) provides important information on the international comparison of international migration inflows and outflows. However, the statistical terms used by OECD in the IMO’s country notes are somewhat different from the statistical terms used in the publications of immigration statistics produced locally in Korea. Thus, this Statistical Brief aims to help understanding definitions and computations of the statistical data used in the IMO and also to compare and closely examine the Korean part of immigration statistics in the IMO’s country notes and immigration statistics produced locally in Korea, thereby contributing to enhancing the accuracy of statistics of Korean immigration in the IMO.

This statistical brief examines the sex, age, length of residence, nationality of immigrant children (at 18 years old or younger) who are currently living in Gyeonggi province by using ‘Korea Immigration Service Statistics DB. It also examine the different distributions of immigrant children among 31 counties of Gyeonggi province by sex, age, length of residence, nationality. Given the lack of research on immigrant children, the findings of this statistical brief may facilitate further study for this group and would be used as basic information for the study.
